and to my wife Thelma, who nursed me back to health

Acknowledgements

IN WRITING THIS book I am indebted to many people. The staff at the West Yorkshire Archive Service, Huddersfield Local History Library and at the University of Huddersfield Library Services have, not for the first time, provided me with excellent support in accessing a range of material. History colleagues at Huddersfield and elsewhere have provided a supportive and encouraging environment. I am also indebted to a range of scholars, whose work has inspired and challenged me, as will be apparent from the references, and to others whose comments have made this a better book than would otherwise have been the case. Again not for the first time, I am most grateful to my wife, Thelma, for reading through and commenting on every draft of the book and, simply but importantly, for tolerating my pre-occupation with long-dead policemen. However, on this occasion, my greatest debt is (by far) to the staff of the intensive care unit at the Huddersfield Royal Infirmary, who in October 2021 saved my life. Quite literally, without them this book would never have been written.
